Glass has come to be a ubiquitous material, present in virtually all areas of buildings. As a construction material, glass is unique in many aspects, including its brittle nature, extreme longevity when handled correctly, and its unicity as a transparent material. This exceptional visit to a glass processing plant offers the opportunity for a small group of interested engineers to learn more about this unique material, its production method, its many different varieties, its uncommon structural behaviour, as well as specific production techniques.

Whether you are already working on façade engineering projects, or you are keen to expand your field of knowledge of construction materials beyond just concrete and steel, this visit offers a unique opportunity and a glimpse into the world of glass and glazing.
